POETRY.

From the Lapilon Keepsake for 1843. Jealousy.

By Sir Edward Lytton Pulwer, Bart. I have thy love-I know no fear Of that divine possession-Yet draw more close, and thou shalt hear A jealous heart's confession.

I nurse no pang lest fairer youth Or loftier hopes should win thee,-There blows no wind to chill the truth. Whose amaranth blooms within thee, Unworthier thee if I could grow, (The love that lured thee perish'd,) Thy women-heart could ne'er forego The earliest dream it cherish'd.

I do not think that doubt and love Are one-whate'er they tell us, Yet-nay-lift not thy looks above, A star can make me jealous!

If that are mine, all mine at last, I covet so the treasure, Wo glance that thou Canet elsewhere cast, But robs me of a pleasure,

I am so much a miser grown, That I could wish to hide thee, Where never breath but mine alone. Could drink delight beside thee ;-

Then say not, with that soothing alr, I have no rival nigh thee-The sundeam lingering in thy bair-The breeze that trembles by theo-

The very herb beneath thy feet-The rose whose odors woo thee-In all things rivals he must meet, Who would be all things to thee!

If sunlight from the dial bo But for one moment banish'd, Turn to the silenced plate and ses The hours themselves are vanish'd ;-

In aught that from me lures thine eyes, My jealousy has trial-The lightest cloud across the skies Has darkness for the dial.

And yet on the evening of that very day you might have caught glimpses of the white dress of Mary as she stood beneath the old vine arbor in the garden, alone with another, listening to the oft told tale again. But this time one might perhaps see that she listens with no unwilling car, while a manly hand clasps hers, and words of passionate feeling are poored forth.
